STRUCTURAL TYPES

and the corresponding physical properties of the polymer.

It is the purpose of this paper to discuss the structural types of polyisobutylene and their relationship to the physical properties of the polymer.

It is apparent that the most significant structural types of polyisobutylene are those which contain a large number of branched or crosslinked structures. These structures are formed by the reaction of isobutylene with itself or with other monomers. The most common type of branched structure is the branched chain polymer, which is formed by the reaction of isobutylene with itself or with other monomers.

The branched chain polymers are formed by the reaction of isobutylene with itself or with other monomers.
